

HOW SWEDE IT IS:

Written by TMAC GOLF
Tuesday, 12 May 2009 08:56

Henrik Stenson has an unusual pre shot routine that paid some huge dividends. The Swede decided to turn a club upside down and swing it a couple of times before he prepared to hit his next shot. After winning the Players, Stenson was asked what was the purpose of the drill. "I really paint the path of the swing, and it's easy to do that without the resistant of a club head," he explained. "Then I can obviously get the same feel from turning the club upside down, and it just gets me on plane. I did that when I won the World Cup with Robert (Karlson) in November and Sun City tournament in December. I didn't do it earlier in the week, but I just kind of picked up the feel again on the range (prior to the final round) and went out and played again as I did in Sun City." It certainly worked for him as his take for winning the Players was a cool $1.7 million. Who said there is a recession?